The Great Western and North Western run their trains over our roads, and we connect directly with other roads, and are thus enabled to embark our passengers from any part of London throughout England. We labor, however, under the disadvantage of having our Circle stations too far removed from the business streets of the city, thus losing the immense local traffic on the Strand, Fleet street, Piccadilly, Regent and Oxford streets. Expensive roads like underground or elevated roads should have their stations near to, f.nd should be built on, the line of great thoroughfares. Ours are along the Thames, where there is very little local traffic, and the stations of the Metropolitan are as far or farther north of the great travel. If we could cut our circle in two we then could compete with omnibuses, etc. I saw the General Manager,...
