In response to growing concern about these reports, the team from WRAIR visited Fort Benjamin Harrison and neighboring facilities in April 1992. During this visit, 79 reservists who were concerned about their health were evaluated. All 79 participants completed a medical questionnaire, and 78 completed a Brief Symptom Inventory (BSI) and were available for a detailed interview. Each reservist interviewed completed a brief psychiatric intake-type interview and had vital signs measured. All but one of the reservists received a dental examination. All 78 who participated in the interviews also had blood drawn for complete blood count, white blood cell differential, platelet count, erythrocyte sedimentation rate, and liver function studies. All sera were tested for antibodies to Leishmania tropica. The performance characteristics of this test for use in screening have not been fully defined (DeFraithe et al. , 1992). Sera from selected individuals were tested for antibodies for brucellosis. Limited comparative data were available from other groups of veterans. Fatigue was the most common symptom (70). Other systemic symptoms, including fever, abdominal pain, and diarrhea, were less common. The onset of fatigue and associated symptoms tended to occur after redeployment from the PG; the onset of diarrhea was more frequent during deployment. No cases of leishmaniasis, brucellosis, or Lyme disease were detected. The findings did not suggest a common pattern of illness among study group members. Review of potential exposures during Operation Desert ShieldStorm (ODSS) provided no evidence that the respondents had exposures to...
