TENTH EPISODE SALVAGE THE odor of drugs hung about Mrs. Wilcox's third floor and drifted faintly down to the hall below. Motherly women from the neighborhood came and went, smiling in a forced manner on Henry; for Mrs. Calverly was gravely ill, had not, in fact, recognized her son since his return from New York. So gravely ill, indeed, was she, that her brother-in-law, Henry's Uncle Arthur, had made a special trip out from Chicago in business hours, and might, it appeared, come again. Uncle Arthur was tall, thin, slightly nervously acid in manner, smartly meticulous in dress as in mind, deeply preoccupied with his own delayed but unmistakably approaching prosperity. His thin mouth was covered by a drooping drab mustache. His voice was inclined to rise in pitch under provocation. Henry was accustomed to see him once a year, on Thanksgiving Day, when he...
